

The Rudraksha Guide

Rudraksha, the most celebrated esoteric accessory of spiritual seekers, has been used extensively since time immemorial. Botanically known as Elaeocarpus Ganitrus Roxb, Rudraksha are the dried seeds of a tree, which grows in select locations of Southeast Asia, predominantly in the upper Himalayan mountain range of the Indian subcontinent. A few rudraksha trees have also been sighted in parts of the Velliangiri Mountains, in the Western Ghats.

The word “rudraksh” literally means “tears of Shiva.” There are many legends in Indian scriptures and mythology that describe the divine origin of the rudraksha tree. According to one legend, Shiva sat in meditation for many millennia with his eyes closed. Upon opening his eyes, he shed tears of ecstasy, which fell to the Earth and became the sacred rudraksha tree. Rudraksha beads were Shiva’s gift to the world.

Conditioning of Rudraksha

To condition new rudraksha beads, immerse them in ghee (clarified butter) for 24 hours and then soak them in full fat milk for an additional 24 hours. Wipe the beads with a clean cloth, but do not wash them with soap. Conditioning should take place every six months.

Proper Care of Rudraksha

Rudraksha can be worn at all times, including while sleeping, during spiritual practices, and even while bathing. However, care must be taken that the rudraksha does not come in contact with hot water or soap. Rudraksha should not come in contact with metal, therefore, it is advisable not to place them in metal containers. However, Rudraksha can be strung with gold or silver if one chooses to do so. Extreme care should be taken when setting the rudraksha in this manner, as damage may occur through improper handling.
